

A
 OF THE
STATE
 OF THE
ENGLISH NATION.

Thursday, June 13, 1796.

I Am loath to fall out about sharing of Beastings, and will not enter into the Debate, whether the King of France shall be Deposed or no; I wish the Gentleman that differs with me a little here, would be content to let us differ without being Angry, and would he do so, I am persuaded we shall both appear to mean the same thing.

I am sincerely desirous, and should be glad to see it, that the King of France and his greatness, was in the Power of the Confederates, and at their dispose; — and tho' I am of the opinion they would still leave him King of France, and that if they did not, they could never agree about the PARTITION, as I have already Noted, yet I readily agree with Mr. Observer in one thing; That bare restoring of Ravish'd Dominions is not a full Satisfaction; the Damages, Havock, and Spoil made in those Countries, which remain to be accorded for.

And without doubt, such Compensation for the said excesses as can be made, or as the Confederates may think reasonable, is just to demand; but to whom shall these Satisfactions be made? To the dead no Satisfaction can be given, for Life admits of no Equivalent, all the Blood shed by the French Tyranny, must be accounted for to Divine Justice; Personal Restitution for the Ravages, and Devastations in the respective Countries can never be made, nor is the Fee Simple of all France able to make Reparation of Damages to Kingdoms, Provinces, Towns, and Families, ruin'd, and Injur'd by the voracious and barbarous Hands of the French.

Where then shall this Satisfaction be obtain'd? And to whom made? Should all the the Confederates bring in a List of Damages, and the Interest upon them; were all the Lands, Tenements, Goods, and Chattles of the King of France, and all his People, to be sold at the highest Purchase, they would not make it good.

To Depose the King, would be no manner of Satisfaction, for another Tyrant might Succeed; to Dethrone the Government it self, and divide his Country, would be some National satisfaction, but no Personal Reparation of Injuries; as to Deposing a Tyrant, I am free of giving my Opinion of that, I would have all Tyrants Depos'd; but then you go upon another Foot, and you must restore the French Nation to their former Liberty, and leave them to Limit both their Crown and its Succession, and Erect such a Government as is most agreeable to the Publick Good, according to the Native Rights and Universal Custom of all Nations in the World; and to Abridge them of this Liberty, would be to Injure them, for take the French as a Nation, Abstracted from the Tyranny and Ambition of their Prince, which they have been as we say, by Force drawn in to concur with; they have done nothing to us, to justify our taking from them the Original Right of choosing their own Governours.

If therefore you will Depose the King of France as a Tyrant, you must leave his Subjects free, to choose what Government they will Erect for there own Safety, and that may protect them from doing, as well as receiving Injury.

I cannot doubt, that this, tho' but a hint, agrees with the meaning, both of Mr. Observer and his Countryman too, for this is the great Foundation, Liberty of Mankind, which all Nations have one time or other assum'd, and often help'd one another to Assume, and indeed are bound in Neighbourhood, as Branches of the General Community of Mankind, to assist one another in.

And I believe I shall be readily agreed with too in this, that if the Tyrannical parts of the French Government, were Depos'd, and the People of France restor'd to their Ancient Liberties and Priviledges; all the Apprehensions of their future Encroachments would dye at once; for People restor'd to Liberty, or in general free Nations are very rarely known to Invade, encroach upon or Oppress their Neighbours.

'Tis the Ambition of Princes, the Avarice, the Pride, and the Vices of Tyrants, that push them upon Arbitrary Invasions, enlarging Dominions, and Robbing their Neighbours; but Nations restor'd to Liberty, have never in the days of Christianity in the World, made such Excursions as these.

Thus the power of France may be secur'd from Injuring EUROPE, without either Deposing the Person, or Line of their Kings; depose the Tyrant and set the People free, they will be safe Neighbours enough; so the Arbitrary Power of encroaching Tyranny, might have been reduc'd in England, without Deposing the late King James, had he thought fit to have born the Operation.

I cannot but allow therefore, that pulling down the Tyrannick Authority of the French Government, and restoring the Subjects to their lost Liberty, would be a glorious Issue of this War; and the most effectual security to the Peace I speak of, and this therefore is included in what I mean, by reducing the Exorbitant Power of France.

As for pulling down the Man, and dividing his Kingdom, I see no need for it, I see no Advantage by it, and I foresee it would set us altogether by the Ears, to attempt it; for new Jealousies, new Disputes, new Clashings of Interest, about Barriers, Securities, and the like; would arise, to the great Danger of that mutual Harmony, which is now the Life of the Confederacy.

I cannot but observe, how this is confirm'd by a Note; I find in one of our News-Papers, from the Hague; viz. That the Duke of Marlborough had Notifi'd to the States, that his Mistress the Queen of England, would not put Garrisons of her own Troops into any of the Towns in Flanders; as being content with a good Barrier

Barrier for them, which is a Barrier for England, or to that purpose, and be adds, That the Dutch are exceedingly pleas'd and satisfi'd with this Declaration. Daily-Courant, No. 1295, Implying, as I think is very plain; That if the Allies should imagine, we design'd to keep the Possession of any thing we obtain'd in Flanders as our own, they would be very uneasy, &c. — To say no more;

I hope I am not Arrogant in saying from hence, that the Jealousie of separate Governments, and States, would be incompatible with a Division of the French Monarchy.

But the freedom of the French Nation, and of all Nations in the World, would be not their safety only, but ours too; Since Liberty is a certain preservative of Peace, and only such Nations as are Slaves to the Tyranny and Pride of others, are made use of to crush and reduce their Neighbours; the Nature of the thing concurs in it, Liberty is the End of Peace, and Peace is the Life of Liberty.

These are pretty Speculations, and this a fine pleasing diverting Subject, a thing quite new in the World, that we can talk of reducing the French Power, as of a thing in view; as if a thing not so crowded with Difficulties as usual; that a Descent upon France, now seems no such impracticable thing as it has been, and the Consternation of the French, at the Prospect of a Storm impending, is very visible from the Ill Condition they are in to Oppose it; that the remote designs of the French in Italy, and Spain, have so weaken'd his hands, that he finds himself struggling with Difficulties at home, in their Prospect Insurmountable, and which threaten him with something fatal, even to the being of his Government.

If this had been the Consequence of one overthrow in the Netherlands, what may we yet find him reduc'd to by the End of this Glorious Campaign? And what a Peace may we not hope for, from the Issue of such a powerful Impression, as the Confederates are yet likely to make before this Summer be over?

I cannot omit to add here, that there are Oppressions upon Trade to be taken off by the Advantages of this Victory, and that when ever a firm and Solid Peace, shall terminate this destructive War, perhaps some Doors of Commerce may be unlock'd, which the French have shut up by heavy Duties and Impositions, equally to Prohibitions, to the Injury of our Woollen Manufacture, and which if restor'd, may help to make us some amends for the vast Expence of a tedious War, and which I doubt not our Governours will insist upon, with more Success than at the Peace of Ryswick.

MISCELLANEA.

I Have all along maintain'd so much Charity for our Friends at home, as not to think there could be any thing left here so Unnatural; I mean of an Englishman, as not to be sincerely pleas'd, with the Glorious Success of the Confederate Arms against the French, — And 'tis not without some horror, that I observe my self to be mistaken, and that there are a Party of Men, who confess themselves Chagrined, or at least do not at all rejoice, at the general Felicity.

I shall not renew the Sence of their Ingratitude to God, and disregard to their Country; by Exposing their foolish Excursions upon this Subject, as I could do, because I think Victory is a Recompence for all their Follies; but the following Letter having been sent by an unknown hand, I insert it rather for the sake of my short Answer to it, than any thing material in it.

to discourage Her Majesty's Subjects, by en-
